Overview

The ability to ask and respond to question is the heart of learning. It is observed that we have been focusing primarily on questions regarding the specific information which students possessed rather than questions to promote learning. Questions should play a central role in the learning process and because of this, we as teachers need to plan our questions carefully which will lead to appropriate assessment strategies.

All those teachers, coordinators head teachers, administrators who would intend to bring essential change in their schools via improving teaching and learning are therefore encouraged to attend this certificate course which aims to provide you an opportunity to envisage the gap between what is being offered at schools and what is needed in 21st century education.
